While I Am a Woman

While the choices I make
Are subject to your scrutiny,
While the clothing I wear
Dictates your views of me,
While the curls of my hair –
Which grow from the root, naturally –
Are judged as lazy and trashy,
While the blood I lose monthly
Is deemed dirty and disgusting,
Corrupting my judgment and leaving
Me unworthy,

I am not your equal.

Speak you to me of equality?
Honey, you don’t know the meaning.

But I won’t stop choosing, and wearing,
and curling,
and bleeding
until I’m sure that you do.

I’ll choose my words carefully –
Making sure not to bruise that delicate ego you hold so dearly –
With the fire that burns beneath my simmering tongue

I’ll wear down your prejudices,
Like the salty waves that slowly but surely Erode their stony oppressors,
A constant barrage of knowledge to combat
Your hateful resistance to change.

I’ll curl around you like smoke,
Make you breathe me in like the inescapable
Atmosphere I am
Fill your lungs with my fragrant essence
Until I am all that pervades your thoughts

And I’ll bleed for my place on this Mother
Of all mothers.
I’ll bleed, and I’ll burn like you’ll never have to Until we finally understand one another.
