How to Create the Perfect Cat

(Part Three)

Jessica Davis

An important next step in shaping your cat's character is showing her that she is better than the other pets in the house. Tell her this verbally in front of the other pets and also treat her better: give her the first treat, put food in her bowl first, et cetera. If your other pet is a dog, don't worry about hurting his feelings – he won't know the difference. It has been my experience that dogs aren't very bright, while cats are. Teaching your cat that she is better than everyone else will make her quite entertaining. For example, my cat thinks she's more important than everything, including my brother and my homework. She sits on anything that I'm trying to read and sometimes physically prevents me from helping my brother with his homework by standing on the table directly in front of my face so I can't see. Monique's superiority complex makes her a lot like a person and therefore an excellent pet. The last factor in creating the perfect cat is providing unconditional love, which includes letting the cat do whatever she wants. This will reinforce her own high opinion of herself, and this is the desired effect. Doing this will also make the cat love you, which does not always happen otherwise. Being loved by a cat is much more fulfilling than being love by a dog, and it will make you feel all warm and fuzzy inside.
