Faith

Omar Lopez

Nova Southeastern University

Follow this and additional works at: https://nsuworks.nova.edu/digressions

Part of the Fine Arts Commons, and the Illustration Commons

Recommended Citation

This Artwork is brought to you for free and open access by the CAHSS Journals at NSUWorks. It has been accepted for inclusion in Digressions Literary Magazine by an authorized editor of NSUWorks. For more information, please contact nsuworks@nova.edu.
At this point, it’s a universally acknowledged truth that a single woman in want of a genuine relationship will find herself alone, chain-smoking on a Saturday night/early Sunday morning. I wonder if I’m the only person at this university who feels like there are walls of pressure closing in around her. I feel like a cross between an HIV-patient and someone with a slight case of pink-eye—we’re both contagious, but the first is a lingering feeling that never disappears, and the second is that itch you can never scratch. Can I ever be comfortable here, or am I doomed to wander alone through my life, with men staring at me like I have a giant zit, or a third nipple, or a head growing out of my ass? (Okay, that’s unfair. Men only stare at me this way when they meet me “professionally.”) I know that it’s uncommon for a woman to be the Sports Editor for a college newspaper, especially when all the big sports are the men’s sports, and especially when the entire staff of male writers quit when I made editor. Nothing like having a five-foot girl in a locker room, or behind the bench. Even though it’s not like I say stupid things—I’ve been watching football with Daddy since I was seven.

Tonight (okay, last night, let’s be precise) was our first home game, and of course it was a giant victory, which means I should really stop writing this and start writing the damn article. But I’m so furious that I can’t imagine writing about miraculous third downs until I can get this insulting, patronizing, unfair evening out of my system, so I’ll smoke and sip at my beer and type this until I’m ready.

I got to the game early, after finally dragging Jane out of the room, beglittered and nervous as hell about her first time as a “varsity cheerleader.” She’s finally in sight of the “real” team, which means maybe Mother will lay off about her not being able to find a future famous football player. (Not