It is an established fact that documents justifying and authorizing the abusive treatment of detainees during interrogation were approved and distributed. This policy demonstrates that this war has tested more than our nation's ability to defend itself. It has tested our response to our fears and the measure of our courage. It has tested our commitment to our most fundamental values and our constitutional principles.

I. INTRODUCTION

Immediately after the attacks on the United States of September 11, 2001, President George W. Bush authorized the National Security Agency to undertake electronic surveillance in violation of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. This was only the first step of an expansive set of claims for the President to act on his own authority to respond to the "war on terror," without regard to whether Congress or the courts would approve or support... these decisions. The President claimed, among other powers, the power to launch preemptive wars on his own authority\(^3\) (although in actuality he sought and obtained authorization to use military force from the Congress\(^4\)); the power to disregard the laws of war pertaining to occupied lands;\(^5\) and the power to define the status and treatment of persons detained as “enemy combatants” in the war on terror.\(^6\)

These claims were not an accident. Vice-President Cheney stated publicly, more than once, that these steps were part of a plan to restore the Presidency to “the proper scope” of its powers even more than a means to defend the nation.\(^7\)

---

Michael Ramsey has delineated the extent to which the lawyers in the Office of Legal Counsel of the Department Justice claimed unilateral authority on behalf of the President when the claims were unnecessary for the specific policies for which they were invoked—a pattern suggestive of a goal of aggrandizing Presidential authority beyond the defense of the nation. This pattern disregards the fact that the President's duty is to enforce the law, not to break it.

Questions of Presidential authority are important. The framers of the Constitution expected the separation of powers to be the primary protection for liberty. They therefore set about to structure each branch's power in ways that allow each to block the other. The framers expected the three branches to contend with each other, and in contending to prevent any single branch from dominating. The framers were prescient—the three branches have contended with each other in shifting balances throughout our history. Yet the recent Presidential claims of unilateral authority in effect would smother the other two branches. Space does not allow a full analysis of the powers of the several branches. This article considers whether the claims of unilateral Presidential authority can be sustained in light of constitutional text and tradition.

II. THE POWERS GRANTED THE PRESIDENT

The grant of powers to the President in Article II of the Constitution is short but impressive. First, Article II vests "the executive Power" in the President. Article II then provides that the President: serves as commander-in-chief of the armed forces; supervises the executive branch, with the obligation to see that the laws are faithfully executed; has the power to grant pardons for offenses.

15. Id. at art. II, § 2 (1).
16. Id. at art. II, §§ 2(1), 3.
against the United States;\textsuperscript{17} has the power to make treaties;\textsuperscript{18} appoints ambassadors, judges, and officers of the United States;\textsuperscript{19} has the power, on occasion, to control the meeting times of Congress;\textsuperscript{20} and is to receive ambassadors.\textsuperscript{21} These powers, if granted fully and exclusively to the President, would vest in him nearly complete control over the government.

Yet none of the specific powers, except perhaps the power to pardon and the limited power over the meetings of the Congress, are vested exclusively in the President. Congress has the power to provide for the common defense,\textsuperscript{22} to declare war,\textsuperscript{23} and to provide for and regulate the military.\textsuperscript{24} Congress even was given the power to grant letters of marque and reprisal\textsuperscript{25}—which arguably gives Congress responsibility for undeclared as well as declared wars.\textsuperscript{26} Moreover, Congress has the power to make, and the courts to construe, the laws the President is faithfully to execute.\textsuperscript{27} Three Presidential powers establish his authority over the conduct of foreign relations, but two of those (the power to appoint ambassadors and to make treaties) require the advice and consent of the Senate (and for treaties, consent must be by a two-thirds majority).\textsuperscript{28} Thus the description of the President as the "sole organ" in the conduct of foreign affairs is something of an exaggeration.\textsuperscript{29} Presidential authority to make other appointments also requires the advice and consent of the Senate.\textsuperscript{30} As for the powers to pardon and to control emergency meetings of Congress, while not expressly limited in the text of the Constitution, there is the "necessary and proper clause": "The Congress shall have Power... To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers,

\begin{enumerate}
\item \textcite{article}, art. II, § 2.
\item \textcite{article}, art. II, § 2(2).
\item \textcite{article}, art. II, § 2(2), (3).
\item \textcite{article}, at art. III.
\item \textcite{article}.
\item \textcite{article}, at art. I, § 8(1).
\item \textcite{article}, at art. I, § 8(11).
\item \textcite{article}, art. I, § 8(11)–(16).
\item \textcite{article}, at art. I, § 8(11).
\item Talbot v. Seeman, 5 U.S. 1 (1801); Bas v. Tingy, 4 U.S. 37 (1800). \textcite{Bradley & Goldsmith, Congressional Authorization and the War on Terror, 118 HARV. L. REV. 2047, 2072–78 (2005)}.
\item \textcite{article}, art. I, § 7; \textcite{article}, at art. III, § 2(1).
\item \textcite{article}, at art. II, § 2(2).
\item \textcite{article}, art. II, § 2(2).
\end{enumerate}
and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof."

Today we are confronted by arguments about a "unitary executive" that, in its more extreme manifestations, claims that the powers vested in the President by the Constitution are exclusive and plenary—without limitation by the other branches of the government, at least during wars or similar crises. Such arguments fly in the face of the text of the Constitution. Some supporters of the strong executive power argue that the specific grants of powers to the President are illustrative of an unrestrained grant of "executive Power," rather than as an exhaustive listing of what the "executive Power" comprises. This argument is not credible. Why would the Framers have bothered to list specific powers, including "some trifling ones," if the "vesting clause" swept everything conceivable within its purview? Nor does this theory find support in the history of the various clauses. The Federalist Papers, for example, viewed the commander-in-chief power as simply the power to command troops in the field and to repel sudden attacks—not "as the power to do whatever

34. Compare Steven G. Calabresi & Saikrishna B. Prakash The President's Power to Execute the Laws, 104 YALE L.J. 541 (1994) (arguing that the "vesting clause" vests a broad executive power beyond the specific grants delineated in Article II) with Lawrence Lessig & Cass R. Sunstein, The President and the Administration, 94 COLUM. L. REV. 1 (1994) (arguing that the "executive Power" must be read as referring to the specific powers granted in Article II).

37. THE FEDERALIST No.69, at 355 (Alexander Hamilton).

it takes to win the war." And consider the federalism concerns if the "inherent power" of the President derives from sources outside the Constitution.40

III. THE POWERS TAKEN BY THE PRESIDENT

Supporters of the "unitary executive" base their claims both on their perception of the necessities of the modern situation and on an extravagant reading of the history of the Presidential powers.41 I do not argue whether an enlarged executive power is necessary as a matter of policy. My concern is narrower and more technical: Is the President authorized to implement the far-reaching powers he has decided upon on his own authority, or must he seek Congressional authorization, except as a temporary reaction to an emergency? Much of this debate turns upon an examination of the historical practice of the office of the President as undertaken by successive Presidents and as Congress and the courts have responded those practices. While persistent institutional impropriety cannot make an unconstitutional practice constitutional,42 institutional practices can inform us what authoritative interpreters of the Constitution regarded as its meaning, particularly when closer in time to the drafting of the language in question.43

Over time there has been an accretion of power in the White House, albeit with conflicts and setbacks along the way. Struggle over the powers of the three branches began with the Constitutional Convention in 1787 and has continued ever since. The problem arises because the framers did not clearly indicate where Presidential authority stopped and the authority of the other branches began. Given their theory that the protection of liberty arose from the clash of the three branches,44 the framers apparently created this confusion

40. Would this mean that the Tenth Amendment—with its admonition that powers not delegated to the federal government in the Constitution are reserved to the states or to the people—is a dead letter?; see also Telman, supra note 36, at 140–46. Does the Tenth Amendment, in order to protect the prerogatives of the States and the people, necessarily protect the prerogatives of the Congress and the courts vis-à-vis the executive branch? Id. at 146–79.

43. See Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 610–11 (1952) (Jackson, J., concurring) ("[A] systematic, unbroken, executive practice, long pursued to the knowledge of the Congress and never before questioned, engaged in by Presidents who have also sworn to uphold the Constitution, making as it were such exercise of power part of the structure of our government, may be treated as a gloss on 'executive Power' vested in the President by § 1 of Art. II.").

deliberately. The first serious controversy over the President’s authority to conduct foreign relations arose with President Washington’s Proclamation of Neutrality calling upon Americans to refrain from taking sides in the conflicts arising from the French Revolution. The proclamation led to an unsuccessful prosecution of an American merchant seaman for cooperating with a French privateer and sparked a debate between Alexander Hamilton (writing as “Pacificus”) and James Madison (writing as “Helvidius”) over Presidential authority. Hamilton argued that the Constitution vested in the President an inherent executive authority that included every aspect of traditional executive (royal) authority not expressly granted to Congress. Yet if the “vesting clause” granting the executive power to the President were so broad, the further listing of specific powers conferred on the President was superfluous. The argument also ignores the “necessary and proper” clause. The debate was too indecisive to resolve the scope of the President’s power.

For truly broad assertions of Presidential powers independently of, or even in defiance of, Congress or the courts, we must turn to the Civil War. President Lincoln undertook to exercise the broadest range of “prerogative power” ever claimed by a President. Faced with attacks on federal facilities

46. J. KENDALL FEW, TRIAL BY JURY 289–97 (1993) (recounting the course of the trial and the jury’s refusal to convict despite a charge from the court that virtually directed a verdict of guilty).

47. The “Pacificus/Helvidius” essays, reprinted in 4 THE FOUNDERS’ CONSTITUTION 63–78 (Philip B. Kurland & Ralph Lerner eds., 1987).

51. David Currie has concluded that at least before 1840, every President acted consistently with the terms of the War Powers Resolution of 1973: “The President may introduce troops into hostilities only pursuant to a congressional declaration of war or other legislative authorization, or in response to an attack on the United States.” David P. Currie, Rumors of War: Presidential and Congressional War Powers, 1809–1829, 67 U. CHI. L. REV. 1, 1 (2000). See also Telman, supra note 36, at 159–65. Washington himself declined to commit troops against Indian tribes without Congressional authorization. See also SOFAER, supra note 29, at 120–27.

52. MARK J. ROZELL, EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE, PRESIDENTIAL POWER, SECRECY, AND ACCOUNTABILITY 36 (2003). Rozell defines “prerogative power” as an executive power “to act according to discretion for the public good, without the prescription of the law and sometimes even against it.” in the South and with the newly elected Congress not yet convened, he undertook dramatic action to suppress the rebellion, calling the militias of the loyal states into federal service and for 75,000 volunteers, suspending habeas corpus (first in Maryland and gradually throughout the country), proclaiming a blockade of the Southern ports, directing the Treasury Department to expend $2,000,000 raised through New York financiers in support of the war effort, and ordering civilians to be tried by military commissions for crimes in support of the Confederacy. None of these actions were authorized by statute, yet it was in Congress, not the President, that the Constitution vested authority to take such decisions. If Lincoln had waited for Congress to convene to vote the necessary measures, however, the war might have been lost before it began. When Congress finally convened, Lincoln reported his actions to Congress and asked it to approve his actions. While he argued for the legality of his actions, he also requested Congress to ratify the decisions, with at least an implicit admission that the decisions could not stand after Congress was in session unless Congress did approve them—as Congress eventually did.

The suspension of habeas corpus was the trickiest problem because Chief Justice Roger Taney issued two writs directing the release of persons imprisoned in Fort McHenry in Baltimore on suspicion of sabotaging telegraph lines and bridges. The state courts in Maryland were open and operating but President Lincoln was unwilling to trust Maryland juries and declined to comply with Taney’s order. Lincoln’s message to Congress came close to 54. U.S. Const. art. 1, § 8(11) ("Congress shall have Power . . . To declare War"); id. at § 8(15) ("Congress shall have Power . . . To provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the laws of the Union."); Id. at § 9(2) ("The privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public safety may require it."); id. at § 9(7) ("No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of Appropriations made by law.").

57. See The Prize Cases, 67 U.S. 635 (1863); see Farber, supra note 53, at 138–43.

conceding the illegality of his defiance. Lincoln argued that he had to choose between his general obligation to see that the laws are faithfully enforced and the specific obligation to respect habeas corpus. He also argued that because of the emergency, his claim of authority to act pending the meeting of Congress was a small implication from the constitutional design. Lincoln argued,

The whole of the laws which were required to be faithfully executed were . . . failing of execution, in nearly one-third of the states. Must they be allowed to finally fail of execution, even had it been perfectly clear that by the use of the means necessary to their execution some single law, made in such extreme tenderness of the citizen’s liberty, that, practically, it relieves more of the guilty than the innocent, should, to a very limited extent, be violated? To state the question more directly: are all the laws, but one, to go unexecuted, and the government to go to pieces, lest that one be violated? Even in such a case, would not the official oath be broken, if the government should be overthrown when it was believed that disregarding the single law would tend to preserve it?

The problem with arguments based on necessity is that claims of necessity can mask a host of sins, and what might seem necessary in the heat of the moment can be embarrassing or worse in hindsight. The rule of law is supposed to prevent such embarrassments. Perhaps this is why Lincoln followed the argument from necessity with a claim that he was not violating the law—leaving the Attorney General to fill in the details. And it is why the Supreme Court, in calmer times, reminded us that: “[e]mergency does not create power. Emergency does not increase granted power, or diminish the restrictions imposed upon power granted . . . .”

After Lincoln’s defiance of Chief Justice Taney, the courts backed away from confronting the President. Lincoln’s most famous action solely on the basis of his authority as commander-in-chief was the Emancipation

60. Lincoln’s Special Message, supra note 56.
61. Id.; see FARBER, supra note 53, at 160–63.
62. Lincoln’s Special Message, supra note 56.
64. Lincoln’s Special Message, supra note 56; see 10 Op. Att’y Gen. 87 (1861).
Proclamation, an executive order issued on September 22, 1862,67 which was ratified by an amendment to the Constitution.68 After the war, the Supreme Court decided that suspension of habeas corpus when civilian courts are open and operating is unconstitutional,69 only to see Congress promptly revoke the Court’s authority to hear appeals in habeas corpus cases.70 But the precedent stands.

Legal conclusions about the inherent powers of the President from Lincoln’s actions are less than clear. Congress, for the most part in fairly short order, ratified his actions. In the two instances in which the judiciary challenged the legality of the President’s actions, Congress supported the President against the Supreme Court. Congressional ratification of the President’s actions was enough to end the matter.

Woodrow Wilson was the next President to assert broad powers, particularly after the United States entered World War I. He relied on a compliant Congress to authorize the extraordinary actions he considered necessary to the war effort.71 He declined to issue an executive order authorizing military courts to try civilians interfering in the war effort.72 Yet he took some actions entirely on his own authority. Rather dramatically, he issued an executive order seizing all railroads in the country, ordering them to be operated by a federal administrator,73 and established the Food Administration, the Grain Corporation, and the World Trade Board by executive order.74

Franklin Delano Roosevelt made extensive use of executive orders in fighting the Depression, some of which orders were highly controversial.75 And

68. U.S. CONST. amend. XIII.
70. Ex parte McCordle, 74 U.S. 506 (1868).
71. See The Espionage Act of 1917, ch. 30, 40 Stat. 217 (1918) (making it a crime to “willfully utter, print, write, or publish any disloyal, profane, scurrilous, or abusive language” about the United States and excluding from the mails any material advocating “treason, insurrection or resistance to any law of the U.S.”); The Sedition Act of 1918, ch. 75, 40 Stat. 553 (1918) (punishing criticism of the war or the government, including any form of language intended to cause contempt or scorn for our form of government, the Constitution, or the flag). See generally NEELY, supra note 53, at 181; REHNQUIST, supra note 55, at 178–83; STONE, supra note 53, at 135–234.
72. SANFORD J. UNGER, FBI 41–42 (1976). Wilson deferred to the Supreme Court’s decision in Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. at 124–25 (holding that military courts could not try civilians when civilian courts are open and functioning).
75. See generally Tara L. Branum, President or King? The Use and Abuse of Executive Orders in Modern Day America, 28 J. LEGIS. 1 (2002).
during World War II, he issued numerous executive orders. The most notorious was Executive Order no. 9066, authorizing the "exclusion" persons of Japanese ancestry from the west coast states—meaning their confinement in concentration camps. Congress shortly thereafter ratified Executive Order no. 9066 by enacting a law making it a misdemeanor to violate the order. Because of this statute, the Supreme Court upheld Executive Order no. 9066 repeatedly. Forty–six years later, Congress enacted a formal apology to the Japanese and Japanese-Americans who had been interned and provided a modest payment ($20,000 per person) as reparations for the wrong done to them.

President Roosevelt also ordered military commissions to try persons arrested in the United States "for offenses against the laws of war and the Articles of War." Eight Nazi saboteurs (including one American citizen) were arrested and brought before a military commission. The Supreme Court reviewed the lower court's denial of the writ of habeas corpus, but concluded that Congress had authorized trial by military commission for violations of the (international) laws of war and the Articles of War. The Court insisted that it had no authority to review whether the defendants were guilty or innocent, but only whether their constitutional rights had been violated; thereafter six of the eight defendants were executed, including the one American citizen. Yet only four years later, in reviewing a writ of habeas corpus for Japanese General

79. Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944); Yasui v. United States, 320 U.S. 115 (1943); Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81 (1943). All three convictions would be vacated some 40 years later because of prosecutorial misconduct. Hirabayashi v. United States, 828 F.2d 591 (9th Cir. 1987); Yasui v. United States, 772 F.2d 1496 (9th Cir. 1985); Korematsu v. United States, 584 F. Supp. 1406 (N.D. Cal. 1984). The Supreme Court also held, on the same day that it decided Korematsu, that detainees who could establish that they were loyal must be released. Ex parte Endo, 323 U.S. 283 (1944).
82. Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1 (1942). The would–be saboteurs were already in custody when the executive orders were issued, having been arrested by the FBI. See LOUIS FISHER, NAZI SABOTEURS ON TRIAL: A MILITARY TRIBUNAL AND AMERICAN LAW 12 (2003). For an argument that these men, or at least the American among them, should have been tried in civilian courts as traitors, see Carlton F.W. Larson, The Forgotten Constitutional Law Treason and the Enemy Combatant Problem, 154 U. PA. L. REV. 863, 894–900 (2006).
84. Id. at 25–30.
85. Id. at 25.
Tomoyuki Yamashita, who was tried before a U.S. military commission in the Philippines, the Court did in fact examine the guilt or innocence of the defendant.\(^8\)

During the Korean War, President Truman ordered the seizure of the steel mills in 1951 to prevent a strike that would have impeded the manufacturing of military equipment and munitions.\(^8\) The majority in Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer\(^8\) held that the executive order was not a military act and therefore not within the President's authority as commander-in-chief;\(^9\) nor could the order be justified under the duty of the President to see that laws are faithfully executed, for he was not enforcing an act of Congress or a command of the Constitution but was making his own law.\(^9\) The case is better known, however, for Justice Robert Jackson's concurring opinion—an opinion that has since been endorsed by a majority of the Court.\(^9\) Jackson described an interpretive continuum according to which a President's actions must be judged. Jackson's analysis provides a template for analyzing the actions of the current President:

The actual art of governing under our Constitution does not and cannot conform to judicial definitions of the power of any of its branches based on isolated clauses or even single Articles torn from context. While the Constitution diffuses power the better to secure liberty, it also contemplates that practice will integrate the dispersed powers into a workable government. It enjoins upon its branches separateness but interdependence, autonomy but reciprocity. Presidential powers are not fixed but fluctuate, depending upon their disjunction or conjunction with those of Congress. . . .

1) When the President acts pursuant to an express or implied authorization of Congress, his authority is at its maximum, for it includes all that he possesses in his own right plus all that Congress can delegate. In these circumstances, and in these only, may he be said . . . to personify the federal sovereignty. If his act is held unconstitutional under these circumstances, it usually means that the Federal Government as an undivided whole lacks power. A seizure executed by the President pursuant to an Act of Congress would be supported by the strongest of presumptions and the widest latitude of judicial

---

86. See generally In re Yamshita, 327 U.S. 1 (1946).
89. Id. at 587.
90. Id. at 587–89.
interpretation, and the burden of persuasion would rest heavily upon any who might attack it.

2) When the President acts in absence of either a congressional grant or denial of authority, he can only rely upon his own independent powers, but there is a zone of twilight in which he and Congress may have concurrent authority, or in which its distribution is uncertain. Therefore, congressional inertia, indifference or quiescence may sometimes, at least as a practical matter, enable, if not invite, measures on independent presidential responsibility. In this area, any actual test of power is likely to depend on the imperatives of events and contemporary imponderables rather than on abstract theories of law.

3) When the President takes measures incompatible with the expressed or implied will of Congress, his power is at its lowest ebb, for then he can rely only upon his own constitutional powers minus any constitutional powers of Congress over the matter. Courts can sustain exclusive Presidential control in such a case only be disabling the Congress from acting upon the subject. Presidential claim to a power at once so conclusive and preclusive must be scrutinized with caution, for what is at stake is the equilibrium established by our constitutional system.92

Presidential exercises of unilateral authority did not end with Youngstown Sheet and Tube, but Presidents thereafter tended to involve Congress in their more controversial actions. In Vietnam, the Presidents did not claim sweeping authority independently of Congress, although they came to be accused of abusing the powers conferred by Congress93 and of lying to Congress to obtain authorization for the war.94 Unity between the political branches did not hold. Congress repealed the authorization in 197195 and took steps to bar continuation of the War.96 Congress also enacted legislation to limit the exercise of presidential authority as commander-in-chief (the War Powers Resolution of 197397) and to assure judicial and congressional oversight of intelligence gathering within and without the United States (the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act98). Presidents have never been happy with these restraints, consistently 92. Youngstown, 343 U.S. at 635–40, 653 (Jackson, J., concurring).

93. See generally STONE, supra note 53, at 427–526.
insisting that they are not bound by them, yet Presidents have complied with them. President Bush's report to Congress on the actions taken to respond to the 9/11 attacks exhibits the typical Presidential posture: compliance with the War Powers Resolution's procedures while insisting that he is not bound by it:

In response to these attacks on our territory, our citizens, and our way of life, I, ordered the deployment of various combat-equipped and combat support forces to a number of foreign nations in the Central and Pacific Command areas of operations... I have taken these actions pursuant to my constitutional authority to conduct U.S. foreign relations and as Commander-in-Chief and Chief Executive.

IV. PRESIDENT BUSH REACTS TO 9/11

The scale and success of the attacks on September 11, as well as the evidence that it was a part of an ongoing, organized global campaign, perhaps made it inevitable that the Bush administration would treat the situation as a war rather than as individual criminal conduct. President Bush the younger declared a "War on Terror" and then proceeded in the name of that war to take a number of unprecedented steps to secure the nation. Congress endorsed the War by approving resolutions authorizing the use of force against terrorists and in Iraq, by enacting the USA PATRIOT Act, and by creating the Department of Homeland Security. Yet, even with these broad powers in hand, the President claimed powers that no prior President had ever claimed: to launch preemptive wars; to establish rules contrary to the recognized laws of war; and to conduct surveillance in violation of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

The President made these claims on the basis of his alleged authority under the Constitution, powers that allegedly were beyond the power of Congress to regulate, restrict, or control. Many of the decisions were taken in secret. This may have been because the Bush administration engaged in systematic violations of the laws of war, laws defined in a series of conventions signed and ratified by the United States.110 Traditionally, the United States had taken the lead in creating and enforcing these laws,111 in our national courts112 as well as through international organizations113 and tribunals.114 While the United States is no longer a leader regarding these rules,115 it did not withdraw its ratifications of the basic documents, nor has it altered its statutes pertaining to the laws of war. On paper, at least, we are still fully committed to the laws of war. The violations of the laws of war eventually became public—particularly the abuse of prisoners. Only gradually did it become clear that these practices extended to the systematic cruel, inhumane, and degrading treatment of prisoners, culminating in some instances in outright torture.116 Major General

107. See the authorities collected supra at notes 2–6.

114. Id. at 312–16.

115. Id. at 154–63, 317–18.

Geoffrey Miller was brought from Guantánamo to Iraq to instruct the prison guards in the “best” ways to interrogate prisoners. And eventually, President Bush acknowledged that these practices—which he termed an “alternative set of procedures” for interrogation—were and would, if he had his way, remain government policy. Yet the Third Geneva Convention expressly prohibits torture, while all four Geneva Conventions, in common article 3, require that “persons taking no active part in hostilities, including members of the armed forces who have laid down their arms” to be treated “humanely,” which is further defined as excluding “murder of all kinds, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture” as well as “outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment.” Common article 3 applies to conflicts “not of an international character.” The Supreme Court resolved doubts about the meaning of the phrase in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, holding that the phrase encompasses all conflicts other than conflicts between nations.

The United States has also ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (“Civil Rights Covenant”), which prohibits torture and the Convention against Torture. The Third Geneva Convention, the Civil Rights Covenant, and the Convention on Torture all forbid derogation from the

---

119. Third Geneva Convention, supra note 110, at arts. 13, 17, 130.

120. Id. at art. 3. See also First Geneva Convention, supra note 110, at art. 3; Second Geneva Convention, supra note 110, at art. 3; Fourth Geneva Convention, supra note 110, at art. 3.

prohibition of torture—unlike other provisions of the Geneva Conventions, there is no military necessity exception to the ban on torture. The United States, in ratifying the Civil Rights Covenant, included a reservation that "The United States considers itself bound by article 7 to the extent that 'cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment or punishment' means the cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Fifth, Eighth, and/or Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States." The UN Committee on Human Rights concluded that the reservation was incompatible with the terms of the Civil Rights Covenant and therefore is void, although the ratification is valid. Even if that is not correct, can anyone contend that intense and on-going mistreatment, even if it does not cause death or severe physical or mental injury, is not "cruel and unusual punishment" as prohibited by the United States Constitution? The Bybee Memorandum sought to evade these strictures by taking the position that if interrogation does not involve life-threatening techniques or serious permanent physical injury ("equivalent to organ failure," or mental suffering that lasts "months or years"), then there is no torture. This was translated by U.S. soldiers guarding prisoners into the slogan, "No blood, no foul." The practices that resulted from such an attitude range from relatively mild all the way up to death: deprivation of sleep, food, and water; covering detainee's heads with hoods; forcing of them to stand in physically stressful positions; the use of dogs to intimidate and abuse prisoners; "waterboarding"; and the beating or suffocating of prisoners to death.

124. Civil Rights Covenant, supra note 122, at art. 4(2); Convention against Torture, supra note 123, at arts. 1(1), 2(2); Third Geneva Convention, supra note 110, at arts. 13, 17, 130.

Applying the argument about the meaning of torture was weak, the authors of the Bybee memorandum also claimed that the President has the power to authorize torture notwithstanding applicable conventions and federal statutes: "Congress may no more regulate the President's ability to detain and interrogate enemy combatants than it may regulate his ability to direct troop movements on the battlefield."\(^{131}\) This argument would make the Uniform Code of Military Justice unconstitutional, despite the Constitution's vesting in Congress of authority to "make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces."\(^{132}\) Why the authors of the Bybee Memorandum chose to do all of this on the authority of the President without involving Congress and the courts, and over the objections of the lawyers in the military services and other operational branches of the government,\(^ {133}\) seems all too clear—these other institutions could not be relied upon to approve the torture or near torture that the administration wanted to use.

The highly dubious constitutional argument that the President, as chief executive and commander-in-chief, cannot be restrained in his decisions about the conduct of military operations has been deployed in defense of indefensible conduct. As Jeremy Waldron put it, "[t]his is not just tinkering with the details of positive law: it amounts to a comprehensive assault on our traditional understanding of the whole legal regime relating to torture."\(^ {134}\) And no legal legerdemain can explain how the President can order such torture when Congress has expressly prohibited torture and the nation has ratified treaties forbidding it.\(^ {135}\) Even if, somehow, one believes these practices are not torture,\textsuperscript{136} Congress has now enacted the Detainee Treatment Act to ban cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment.\textsuperscript{137} Since January 1, 2006, there really is no room for argument that the international standards do not apply in full. Yet President Bush responded with a "signing statement" in signing the bill in which he insisted that nothing in this law impaired his powers as commander-in-chief to do whatever is necessary to protect the country.\textsuperscript{138}

\(^{131}\) Bybee Memorandum, supra note 6, at 39.

V. THE DENOUEMENT, PERHAPS

The other branches of government long deferred to the Presidential assertions of authority, contrary to the expectations of the framers of the Constitution.\textsuperscript{139} But, just as lawyers played key roles in preparing documents purporting to justify the various policies instituted on the sole authority of the President,\textsuperscript{140} lawyers also challenged the various policies from the beginning—often acting as \textit{pro bono} (unpaid) volunteers in defense of the rule of law. Eventually, several of these cases reached the Supreme Court of the United States.\textsuperscript{141} While the Court consistently ruled against the government in these cases, the Court always ruled on narrow grounds that did not address the questions of whether the President was exceeding his constitutional powers until the Court decided the case of \textit{Hamdan v. Rumsfeld}\textsuperscript{142} in 2006.

\textit{Hamdan} involved the prosecution of a former chauffeur for Osama bin Laden for various war crimes. The prosecution was to be before a military commission created by executive order consistent neither with normal civilian (Article III) courts nor with normal military courts (Courts Martial).\textsuperscript{143} The \textsuperscript{136} See, e.g., John C. Yoo, \textit{With All Necessary Force}, L.A. TIMES, June 11, 2004, at 13 ("the U.S. is not required to treat captured terrorists as if they were guests at a hotel or suspects held at an American police station").

\textsuperscript{139} See the text accompanied in supra.

\textsuperscript{140} See the authorities collected supra note 6.

\textsuperscript{142} \textit{See generally Hamdan}, 126 S. Ct. 2749.

\textsuperscript{143} Military Order on the Detention, Treatment, and Trail of Certain Non–Citizens in the War on Terrorism issued by George W. Bush, Nov. 13, 2001, 66 FED. REG. 222 (codified at 3 CFR 918 (2002)).
Court, by a vote of 5–3 (with the Chief Justice, who had voted in favor of the government in the case at the Court of Appeals level,\textsuperscript{144} recusing himself) held that the President lacks authority to create such a tribunal in the face of valid statutes limiting the types of courts and procedures to be used in such trials.\textsuperscript{145} The Court, in an opinion by Justice John Paul Stevens, held that mere emergency ("exigency alone") does not justify the creation of "penal tribunals" that are not authorized by Act of Congress or the Constitution itself\textsuperscript{146} and went on to reaffirm the most central holding of Ex parte Milligan:\textsuperscript{147} The President's job is to enforce the law, not to make whatever laws he likes in disregard of binding Acts of Congress or valid treaties.\textsuperscript{148} The Court then carefully examined the procedures provided for the proposed military commissions and found that those procedures violated both the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the four Geneva Conventions.\textsuperscript{149} Justice Anthony Kennedy declined to join some other parts of the majority opinion, but concurred in all of the points just discussed.\textsuperscript{150} Justices Samuel Alito, Antonin Scalia, and Clarence Thomas dissented on a range of points in opinions written by Scalia and Thomas.
Justice Scalia focused primarily on whether the Court had the authority to review Hamdan's appeal at all,\textsuperscript{151} while Justice Thomas wrote an impassioned defense of the President's power to command the military without let or hindrance from the court.\textsuperscript{152}

Justice Stevens' opinion was long, technical, and narrow, perhaps in order to avoid the risks of appearing to be too "activist" in a case where the future safety or even survival of the nation might be at risk.\textsuperscript{153} Still Justice Stevens' opinion made the point that the President could not proceed without Congressional authorization.\textsuperscript{154} The opinion also confined itself to the question \textit{generally} Bradley & Goldsmith, \textit{supra} note 26, at 2127–33.

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{144} Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 415 F.3d 33 (D.C. Cir. 2005).
\item \textsuperscript{145} \textit{Hamdan}, 126 S. Ct. at 2772–75.
\item \textsuperscript{146} \textit{id.} at 2773.
\item \textsuperscript{147} \textit{Ex Parte Milligan}, 71 U.S. 2(4 Wall. 2), 139–40 (1866).
\item \textsuperscript{148} \textit{Hamdan}, 126 S. Ct. at 2773–74.
\item \textsuperscript{149} \textit{id.} at 2786–96. \textit{See} Uniform Code of Military Justice, 10 U.S.C. §§ 801 to 946 (2000). The four Geneva Conventions are collected at \textit{supra} note 110. The Court focused particularly on 10 U.S.C. §§ 821, 836.
\item \textsuperscript{150} \textit{Hamdan}, 126 S. Ct. at 2799–2809.
\item \textsuperscript{151} \textit{id.} at 2809–22 (Scalia, J., dissenting).
\item \textsuperscript{152} \textit{id.} at 2823–55 (Thomas, J., dissenting).
\item \textsuperscript{153} \textit{Cf.} Sunstein, \textit{supra} note 66 (arguing that the American legal tradition of deciding cases on non-constitutional grounds when possible allows courts a ready excuse for not confronting the executive branch in such cases).
\item \textsuperscript{154} \textit{Hamdan}, 126 S. Ct. at 2772–75.
\end{itemize}
of the use of the presidentially created military commissions to try persons accused of crimes, and did not mention, even in passing, the numerous other Presidential assertions of unilateral authority to defend the nation. While the implications of the decision for these other assertions of authority seemed clear enough, the Bush administration insists that the decision applies only to the military commission question.155

Has the President learned anything from his errors? It seems not. As of this writing, the President and a newly aroused Senate are locked in disagreement over whether to enact a statute authorizing the procedures disapproved in Hamdan156—secret trials, denying a defendant access to some of the evidence, with hearsay entered into evidence, and without confrontation of the witnesses.157 The President is even more adamant about modifying other unilateral policies that at the least intrude upon the responsibilities of Congress, some of which are arguably illegal.158

VI. CONCLUSIONS

Disclosure of these practices had disastrous effects for the global image of the United States. From the near unanimous support for the United States after the September 11th attacks,159 the Bush Administration managed in only 156. Hamdan, 126 S. Ct. at 2785–92.

three years to make the United States an international pariah.\textsuperscript{160} The image of the United States—one of our more important assets during the Cold War—has only gotten worse since.\textsuperscript{161} And we pay a predictable price, as when the Chinese officials dismiss criticism of their violations of human rights with the response that "they have no lessons to learn from an administration that produced the abuses at Abu Ghreib prison in Iraq and detainment centers in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, Afghanistan, and elsewhere."\textsuperscript{162}

The domestic consequences these asserted powers are no less momentous. The various actions constitute a pattern—a plan even\textsuperscript{163}—of asserting Presidential authority to act unilaterally, regardless of the authority or decisions of the other branches of government. The Pentagon, moreover, has announced plans for a "long war"—one that would last decades.\textsuperscript{164} The nature of the war made by terrorists makes it difficult to sort combatants from civilians, to identify "enemy aliens," to determine whether someone is captured on a battlefield or elsewhere, or even to determine whether the enemy has been defeated and the war is at an end.\textsuperscript{165} All this makes arguments about the need to set aside the usual rules for the duration of the emergency even more alarming.\textsuperscript{166}

\textsuperscript{164} See the authorities collected supra notes 7, 8.

\textsuperscript{166} See Lobel, supra note 105.
This pattern of arrogation of power should alarm any unbiased observer. As Bill Keller, Executive Editor of the New York Times, stated recently, "I don't know how far action will follow rhetoric, but some days it sounds like the administration is declaring war at home on the values it professes to be promoting abroad." Justice David Souter, in his concurring opinion in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, expressed what ought to be the national attitude:

In a government of separated powers, deciding finally on what is a reasonable degree of guaranteed liberty whether in peace or in war (or some condition in between) is not well entrusted to the Executive Branch of Government, whose particular responsibility is to maintain security. For reasons of inescapable human nature, the branch of the Government asked to counter a serious threat is not the branch on which to rest the Nation's entire reliance on striking the balance between the will to win and the cost in liberty on the way to victory; the responsibility for security will naturally amplify the claim that security legitimately raises.

Justice Souter's analysis might be considered prudential, yet his analysis points to something more basic, as Justice Robert Jackson pointed out more than 50 years ago in Youngstown Sheet and Tube: The President's power to act unilaterally is strictly limited by the Constitution and by valid treaties and acts of Congress. Constraints on the unilateral authority of the President are among the most central safeguards of our liberties. Have the terrorists succeeded in making it impossible for us to uphold those limitations? Or are we just afraid to take reasonable risks in order to uphold our ideals?

---

